Cinema release – a twist in the tale as Netflix goes hunting for Oscars

Mark Sweney

21 November, 2018

- Netflix's film Roma was shown in cinemas around the world recently. It is a film that many people think will win an Oscar. Showing a film in cinemas is a change of strategy for Netflix because it hopes to use the marketing power of the Academy Awards to attract more subscribers. The film has received good reviews and is one of three films that Netflix is releasing in cinemas before its 140 million subscribers can watch them.
- In the past, Ted Sarandos, the man in charge of Netflix's $8 billion annual content budget, has criticized the film industry convention of giving films an exclusive run in cinemas before they can be shown on TV or the internet or sold as DVDs. But that was before Netflix decided that it wants Oscars.
- For a film to be nominated for an Academy Award, it must play in a Los Angeles cinema for a minimum of seven consecutive days. Roma was released in LA, New York, Mexico and London, before opening worldwide on Netflix on 14 December. But it will get just three weeks in US cinemas – the other two films will disappear after only a week each – as Netflix meets the minimum requirements.
- "At the moment, Netflix is perhaps exploiting the system a little bit and it is taking advantage of rules for entry. This suggests the situation is benefiting Netflix more than the Oscars," said Richard Broughton, a media analyst. "They are simply meeting the minimum requirements."
- Apart from the Oscar rules, cinema owners have agreed with Hollywood studios that films should be shown in US cinemas for 90 days before they can be shown on TV or the internet or sold as DVDs. The subscription video-on-demand sector, where Netflix operates, was traditionally seen as less important. There are similar agreements in most other countries around the world but with different time limits.
- Roma* was shown on more than 100 screens around the world. It means it will probably be more successful than Netflix's biggest cinema release before that, 22 July. But it is very far from the level of a mass-market Hollywood film: the US has more than 40,000 screens and the UK over 4,000.
- It is well known that winning awards sells cinema tickets – or in Netflix's case, attracts new subscribers – but for Netflix, success at the Oscars is also about confirming its position as the digital newcomer that broke the old Hollywood model. It has already taken control of TV. In September, 2018, Netflix broke the record for the most Emmy nominations by winning a total of 112.
- So far, Netflix has achieved 14 Oscar nominations with two wins: White Helmets and Icarus. But Amazon became the first streaming company to win a best picture Oscar nomination for 2017's Manchester by the Sea.
- The 2018 Oscars television broadcast attracted its smallest ever audience, partly because of the streaming revolution. Some people say that Hollywood needs Netflix to revive interest in its awards.
- "This is a changing situation that both sides still need to work out," says Paul Dergarabedian, another media analyst. "But the problem for Netflix is that they want to be considered for the Oscars, but their small-screen distribution model goes against the movie-theatre release convention. Amazon Studios has shown that it is possible to do both."
